MOBBED.

BY MARCUS JERTES.

The fair pale moon swung up over the city lighting up the streets, business houses, churches and prisons, happy homes and scenes of revelry and pleasure. All along the main business streets, or the town the electric lights added to the brilliancy of the night and the shadows flitted here and there as hurrying feet and rolling carriages passed by. Ten o'clock struck from the steeple of the Presbyterian church and forth from by-street and alley came little groups of men and all appeared to be hurrying in the same direction. Below the market square stood the city prison its cold, sombre walls rising bleakly and sinisterly towards the sky. A great crowd surrounded it and an angry hum filled the air as a thousand men raised their voices in curses and execrations. The streets were blocked and drawn up in close rank around the jail stood a cordon of police, the stars on their breasts flashing and glittering in the dazzling electric light. Shoulder to shoulder with set faces and helmets drawn down over their faces like men who were facing a storm of hail.

A terrible crime had been committed and pent-up indignation was about to burst in a storm of vengeance and hate and five thousand men stood ready to wrest from the protection of the law, the guilty wretch who covered terror stricken in his cell as the yells of the mob grew louder and louder.

He was a young man, smooth faced and light haired and not more than twenty-one. Great drops of perspiration rolled down his face though the night was chill and raw and he could not get still a minute at a time but moved back and forth in his cell like a caged beast. One moment he would approach the steel grating and peer wildly out. Just across from his cell was a window and by standing on his tip-toes the young prisoner could catch a fleeting glimpse of the surging crowd outside and hear the frenzied shouts of the men who were demanding his life. Young, handsome and just entering manhood, the hour had come for him to die.

The night before he had entered a house for the purpose of robbery and being detected had shot and killed a prominent and popular professional man and his wife, capture had followed the crime and now the fury of the people was about to burst over his doomed head. He bent and listened to catch the words of the mob outside and every word fell on his ear like a knell. Once he had been the petted and spoiled idol of his home, educated and refined, yet a hardened criminal. Thoughts of those he left at home flashed through his mind and for the first time in years a tear fell on his cheek and his face quivered in an agony of remorse.

Hark! A great blow shook the jail's outer door and the shouting and cursing broke out afresh, telling that the attack on the jail had began in earnest. A great body of infuriated men had hurled themselves on the police and the battle was on. Pistol shots, blows and frenzied shouts, a few minutes of fishing hand to hand and the police were overpowered.

The doomed man had stood with face pressed against the bars and his hands clutching the steel des-pairingly while the brief struggle lasted and his last hope faded away as a sledge hammer fell on the
